Poetry.
The Violet.
BY MRS. CLARA B. HEATH.

It peeped, in spring, from a dew-drenched sod,
With its blue eye upward turned.
And a maid passed by, with a scornful eye,
And the modest flow'et upturned;
But with face half hid in the mossy sod,
The violet still smiled on—
For it thought no more of the frowning face,
Nor the proud, scornful look of scorn.
And that same bright morn'g came a child at play,
With ringlets of golden hair,
And a cherub brow with innocence crowned,
And an eye all darkly blue,
And kneeling down on the flowery turf,
Glittering with pearls and showers,
That violet's face, with a winning grace,
Gave thanks to the God of flowers.

Literature.
My First Temptation.

At an early age I lost my father, and as he left but little of this world's goods, it soon became necessary that I should find some employment. I was then thirteen years of age, and not very stout or strong, but yet with a will to do anything that could be found for me to do. At length my brother made an arrangement with a carpenter by the name of Morris, and I was taken into his shop as an apprentice. With him I remained two years, but at the end of that time I became so worn down by the hard work imposed upon me, that my mother resolved I should remain there no longer. My sister Lucy, who was two years older than myself, had long detected my failing strength—and it was mainly through her efforts that I was removed from the place, for I should never have complained.

I was now fifteen—tall, slim, pale, and I knew that I could not stand any sort of work that taxed my physical strength to any great extent. But fortune favored me. "A Mr. Evered, who kept a dry goods store near by, was in want of a salesman, and through my sister's influence I obtained the place. Mr. Evered had a daughter, Julia, about my own age, who was very intimate with Lucy, and it was by her intercessions with her father that I gained my point.

I was duly installed in my place, and I was soon happy and contented, and my employer kind, and some intimacy sprang up between myself and Julia, which afforded me a pure bliss that I had ever before experienced. "Thus matters passed on for a year, and at the end of that time my health was restored, and I had so far gained upon the confidence of Mr. Evered that he had trusted me with some of his most particular business. Only one thing troubled me. I was not receiving such wages as I fancied my services entitled me to. In fact, I was in debt. I had purchased a suit of clothes of a tailor in the neighborhood, and I was owing for them. The tailor wanted his money, and I had promised he should have it at a certain time; but that time came and passed, and I could not pay him. He threatened, and I promised never. O, how many times I wished that I had never bought those clothes. I could have got along without them, and I resolved that never again would I buy anything which I could not pay for on the spot. But that did not help the case.

One evening I sat alone in the store. It was on Saturday evening, and the day had been a busy one. We had sold a great quantity of goods, and the money drawer was well filled. Slowly a demon arose before me, and began to advise me. He pointed to the money drawer and whispered: "There are the means for paying your debt." I knew that Mr. Evered had no knowledge of the amount there, for he knew not how much I had sold. I could take even fifty dollars, and he would never miss it, for I had sold a great quantity of stuff which he had no account of. I had promised the tailor that he should have the money that very night, and I had planned to get Mr. Evered to advance the necessary sum. I had not been spending money foolishly, but from my poor pitance I supported my mother and that ate it all up.

For a long while I sat and looked upon that drawer, and all the while the tempter was persuading me. I knew that young clerks often did such things, and that some times necessity compelled them to do it—at least so I thought. How could I meet my creditor again without the money? I could not; at length I resolved and re-resolved that I would not. I arose and went to the drawer. I opened it, and saw the bank notes which had been jammed in there—I counted out twenty dollars! My hand trembled and my heart beat quickly. I thrust the notes into my pocket, and then hastened back to my seat, and not long afterwards my employer entered.

"Well, Charles," said he, "I guess we'll shut up now."
I arose, went out and put up the shutters, and when I came back I found Mr. Evered engaged in counting the money. As I approached him he eyed me with a sharp searching look, and I trembled like an aspen.

"What ails you, Charles?" Mr. Evered kindly asked.
"My soul—such a dream!" I involuntarily gasped.

"Well, well—if it's nothing worse than that, I can glad. But come, I want to have a few words with you before you go."

"I was fully aroused now, I looked at the money drawer, though many times ere I could fully realize that I was safe. The doors and shutters were closed and then my employer sat down by my side.

"Well, Charles," he commenced, "Julia has been telling me this afternoon that you wholly supported your mother."

"Yes, sir," I tremblingly answered. "My sister this far has only been able to support herself, and the rest comes on me."

"But how do you get along? Surely, your salary here is not sufficient."

"It has been sufficient, sir, to find us in food and fuel. For—for clothing—I have—"

"Run in debt, eh?"
"Yes, sir; but will never do it again. I will go ragged if need be, but I will not run in debt."

"Right, right," my boy! But we will fix that right now. I have been thinking for some time of increasing your pay, and I will do so now—only only so, but I must put it back to where I first thought of it, and that was three months ago. Let's see."

"Three dollars a week for thirteen weeks would be thirty-nine dollars," he said. "Will that square you?"
"O, yes, sir, and more, more than!"
"Then you shall have that, and hereafter you shall have that amount over each quarter."

He said something more about making me his head clerk at some time, but I did not fully understand him. I received the money, paid the tailor, and when I had reached my home, I was calm and happy. I told my mother and Lucy of my good fortune, and they were overjoyed.

shape or form, but it came at last. I could not keep it back. Thief! Thief! rang in my soul till an agony was upon me so intense that all other conceptions of pain were as nothing. The night passed away in sleepless phantom making restlessness; and when the morning came, I arose and walked out, before my mother's sister was up. I did not return until breakfast was ready, and then I had so overreaching outward signs, that little remark was made upon it. But the victim was gnawing at my heart.

"That forenoon I went with my sister to meeting. As I entered the little church I met the gaze of Mr. Evered. He watched me sharply, and I saw marks of pain on his face. After the services were over, I saw him in conversation with the tailor. I noticed how earnestly they spoke—and once I saw the tailor point his finger towards me. I felt sure then, that all was discovered.

"For mercy's sake, Charles what is the matter?" cried Lucy, as she caught hold of my arm.

"He's faint! he's faint!" I heard a low tremulous voice; and on turning, I saw Julia Evered. She was frightened—and at that moment came the conviction that she loved me. But that other thought came with it; and then I knew ere long she would despise me.

Sick and faint I hurried away, and to all the anxious inquiries of Lucy, I only replied that I was not well. O, how miserably I felt. I knew my employer had detected the theft. His gaze at me in church was proof enough; but his conversation with the tailor made it sure. That afternoon I dared not go to church, and my mother worried over me, if she would have let me alone, I might have been less miserable; but she clung close to me, and I had to lie to her—the first falsehood I ever spoke to that noble woman.

Another night of restless agony, and then I came to the severest part of all. I must meet my employer! It was late when I descended to the kitchen, and I found my mother as pale and as deathly as death itself. For the moment I forgot my own pain, and hastened to her side. She gazed up into my face with such a look as I hope I may never see again.

"Don't ask me any questions, Charles," she said, but go at once to the store; Mr. Evered wants you immediately."

I could not ask a question—I could not speak. Without breakfast—without waiting to see Lucy, I started from the house. "People whom I met gazed at me sharply, and once I heard the word thief pronounced! O, Evered had not told the story of crime! How could he? No, no, 'twas the tailor who told it, for my employer would never have done it. Yet it was known. I stopped, and suddenly the thought of flight occurred to me. Why had I not thought of it before? Why should I stay longer where shame only could be mine? I turned to flee; and just then my sister came rushing after me, with her hair floating wildly on the morning air, and her face as pale as death.

"O, Charles, she uttered come with me at once! Come, come, our mother is dying."

My sister seized my hand, and by force dragged me away. I reached my home, I knew not how for my reason had almost left me. Into the little bed room Lucy dragged me, and there lay my mother, stark and cold.

"O, Charles you have killed her! sobbed my sister, as she threw herself upon the bed. She could not stand your disgrace!"

One moment I gazed upon that pale, cold form, and then a wild wailing cry broke from my lips. I plunged madly forward upon the bed.

"Charles! Charles!"
I started up. I felt a heavy hand upon my shoulders; again my name was called.

"What is the matter? Come rose up—for mercy's sake, what is the matter?"

It was Evered who spoke. "I was still sitting upon the stool behind the counter but my head had fallen forward upon a pile of goods that lay heaped up before me. Instinctively I cast my eyes upon the money drawer and slowly the truth worked its way into my mind. A cold chill swept was upon my brow, a pain in my limbs, and I trembled like an aspen.

"What ails you, Charles?" Mr. Evered kindly asked.
"My soul—such a dream!" I involuntarily gasped.

"Well, well—if it's nothing worse than that, I can glad. But come, I want to have a few words with you before you go."

"I was fully aroused now, I looked at the money drawer, though many times ere I could fully realize that I was safe. The doors and shutters were closed and then my employer sat down by my side.

"Well, Charles," he commenced, "Julia has been telling me this afternoon that you wholly supported your mother."

"Yes, sir," I tremblingly answered. "My sister this far has only been able to support herself, and the rest comes on me."

"But how do you get along? Surely, your salary here is not sufficient."

"It has been sufficient, sir, to find us in food and fuel. For—for clothing—I have—"

"Run in debt, eh?"
"Yes, sir; but will never do it again. I will go ragged if need be, but I will not run in debt."

"Right, right," my boy! But we will fix that right now. I have been thinking for some time of increasing your pay, and I will do so now—only only so, but I must put it back to where I first thought of it, and that was three months ago. Let's see."

"Three dollars a week for thirteen weeks would be thirty-nine dollars," he said. "Will that square you?"
"O, yes, sir, and more, more than!"
"Then you shall have that, and hereafter you shall have that amount over each quarter."

Lucy's husband. My mother still lives, and thank God, can bless her son that he has never yet called one drop of sorrow to her life cup.
